Dorchester is a pretty little village on the banks of the Thames, close to its junction with the Thames. It was once a place of considerable importance surrounded by fortifications, of which, however, no trace now remains. Here is found one of the most interesting churches in England, it being formerly a portion of the powerful Abbey of Black Canons, founded here by Bishop Alexander in 1140. This Abbey survived until the Reformation, when it was dissolved and the church purchased for the parish by Richard Bewforest for £140.
